Preface

The 2nd Annual White Collar Crime Workshop co-sponsored by Shinshu University builds upon important discussions begun in 2019 at the Embassy of Japan in Washington, DC, where leading academics and esteemed practitioners from both the United States and Japan gathered to share expertise, learn from each other, and build friendships around the common goal of advancing justice and the rule of law.

Continuing and expanding this dialogue remains critical in the era of COVID travel restrictions. The conference organizers are to be commended for transitioning this year's program to a virtual format while at the same time creating a compelling agenda focused on collaboration, emerging developments, and law reform in the white-collar crime area.

I am honored to be a part of this important dialogue between the United States and Japan, and my hope is that it advances the cause of justice and the rule of law principles that we share. I hope to see you at this November's virtual conference, and in person soon. And I hope that you and your families are and remain healthy and well.

His work makes creative use of the tools of law and economics—an approach that originated at the Law School, which maintains leadership in the field through such initiatives as the Coase-Sandor Institute for Law and Economics. Frequently, Miles' work uses the methods of law and economics to investigate social questions not conventionally thought to fall within that field, such as his recent work with Adam Cox at New York University School of Law that examined how African-American judges tended to decide voting rights cases differently than white judges and that the presence of an African-American judge on a judicial panel also tended to influence how white judges decided the case. Their research was the first to find robust statistical evidence that the racial identity of judges matters in how judicial panels decide cases, and highlighted the importance of diversity on the bench.

While at DOJ, Benczkowski also implemented several policy changes related to how the Department of Justice prosecutes corporations. These policies included enhanced criteria for how the Criminal Division selects corporate monitors, as well as changes to the way the Division evaluates corporate compliance programs and claims of inability to pay criminal fines and penalties, revisions to the FCPA Resource Guide, amendments to the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy (CEP), and the FCPA Unit’s publication of declination letters online.
